ACADEMIC MACE

The ceremonial academic mace was first used in 1385 at the University of Vienna, when two ancient instruments, the royal scepter and the battle mace, were combined to form a symbol of the power and authority vested in the institution. An academic mace is traditionally carried in procession and mounted on stage whenever degrees are granted or when the faculty is assembled in formal academic dress. Designs of academic maces vary among institutions but usually consist of a shaft topped with a large ornament depicting the symbols of the school's traditions and history.

The Loyola Marymount University mace has been carried prominently in commencement processions for over three decades and is rich with the history of Loyola and Marymount traditions. The mace was originally commissioned and designed in 1970 by Dr. Renée Harrangue, academic dean at Marymount College. Sister Regina Buchholz, S.C.R.H., a lecturer in the Marymount Department of Art, crafted the design into the mace used by Marymount College. Loyola University did not have a mace, and when the two schools merged, Donald P. Merrifield, S.J., president of Loyola Marymount University, asked that the Marymount mace be modified to reflect the newly formed Loyola Marymount University. Two faces of the mace depict the University Seal, one uses the Papal Seal and the fourth includes the American shield of stars and stripes. The resulting mace is carried today in the commencement procession.
