1-1-2016

Review: William Fitzgerald’s Spiritual Modalities: Prayer as Rhetoric and Performance

Steven J. Mailloux

Loyola Marymount University, Steven.Mailloux@lmu.edu
form, or form over content? Malm’s work is not really situated in relation to extant criticism on Aristotle and his reception, despite the eighteen pages on which the eminent Classics scholar Stephen Halliwell is cited. In the end, I have no clear sense of either Halliwell’s arguments or how Malm’s account of mimesis may or may not relate to them. Other scholars are cited with still greater opacity: for example, in a not uninteresting excursion on the sublime and its relation to visualization (phantasia), we are told, “The evolution of aesthetics can be tied to the evolution of a new kind of social subject, as Peter de Bolla has demonstrated” (p. 139). No explanation follows.

To my mind, the best chapter of The Soul of Poetry Redefined is its tenth and last, “Emotions and the system of genres” (pp. 171–85). Here Malm advances, however tentatively, a real argument with explanatory force. Addressing the question of why Aristotle stresses content over style and dramatic poetry over lyric, Malm writes that in the Poetics, “The pleasure of poetry... comes mainly from understanding, and from pity and fear which are means of understanding. In this way, Aristotle distances poetry considerably from the Platonic critique of linguistic voluptuousness and decadence. . . .

Defining the soul of poetry as lexis, mimesis-representation would have been to subject it to Plato’s critique of rhetoric and representation. The soul of poetry being muthos, content and structure, poetry becomes less reproachable” (p. 175). For Aristotle, emotions are “instrumental,” intended to influence an audience, and thus fundamentally rhetorical (p. 176). It is only in the Renaissance—Malm adduces Antonio Minturno’s L’Arte Poetica (1564)—that lyric, as the representation of a character’s emotions, is theorized as a third genre alongside epic and drama. “The definition of a lyric genre,” Malm argues, “could only take place by redefining emotions from instruments into objects” (p. 178)—a process Malm associates with painting and its theorization as the objective representation of emotion (pp. 178–83). These arguments, sketched at the end of Malm’s study, might profitably be pursued in future research.

Whatever the shortcomings of its content might be, The Soul of Poetry Redefined is, as a physical object, resplendent. In cover design, front papers (of a deep scarlet), page layout, and type face, the book is a delight to behold; its paper quality is a delight for the fingers. The Museum Tusculanum Press of the University of Copenhagen is to be commended for reminding us in the age of the internet that academic books can still be things of beauty.

Adam Potkay,
The College of William and Mary, Williamsburg

Spiritual Modalities is an extremely useful book. It not only explores in depth the rhetorical power of prayer; it also provides abundant hermeneutic resources for the further study of this ancient yet still contemporary speech act genre. Creatively employing Kenneth Burke’s dramatism as an interpretive lens, William Fitzgerald has written a detailed post-secular analysis that reveals prayer as an embodied performance, a cognitive scene of address, a material act of invocation, and a social attitude of reverence. Historians of rhetoric might question Fitzgerald’s claim that his book is “the first systematic study of prayer in relation to rhetoric” (3) and place it instead within the loose tradition of rhetorics of prayer (sometimes anachronistically called artes orandi) that stretches back to William of Auvergne’s Rhetorica divina and Erasmus’s Modus orandi Deum. Nonetheless, Spiritual Modalities is certainly a significant contribution to the ongoing religious turn in rhetorical studies and the human sciences more generally.

One of the most impressive things about Spiritual Modalities is that Fitzgerald achieves many critical and theoretical goals simultaneously and thus his book can be used in different ways by different readers. For example, he analyzes prayer as a specific rhetorical genre and also employs it as a general meta-rhetorical framework. Rhetorical critics of prayer will value the rich illustrations of specific readings of prayers as texts, while rhetorical theorists will discover new insights into the prayerful quality of all rhetorical performances. One reason Fitzgerald can accomplish so much in his book is that he proposes a capacious and suggestive definition of prayer to begin with. Prayer for Fitzgerald is a discursive art requiring human capacities with language that enable complex relationships with otherworldly audiences. Prayer is “the human side of any human-divine encounter” and therefore involves an asymmetrical and one-way mode of address even when it is viewed within a dialogic relation (34–35).

Fitzgerald enriches his definition of prayer through an exploration of Burke’s dramatism, ingeniously employing the revised motivational hexad of act, agent, agency, purpose, scene, and attitude. His strong thinking with Burke represents a concrete demonstration of how Fitzgerald critically examines prayer as a rhetorical genre and theorizes all rhetoric as having a prayerful dimension. Burke’s dramatism offers a vocabulary for analyzing the performative complexity of even the simplest prayer—prayer as rhetoric—and for underlining the prayerful aspects of all effective language use—rhetoric as prayer. For Burke, prayer has the purpose of shaping character by disposing actors to perform actions.

In his first chapter Fitzgerald builds on the Burkean notion of literature as experiential equipment to develop a framework for prayer as a situated space of “rehearsal for living” (22). He proposes an axial model for describing this situated space of prayerful rhetoric: a horizontal axis encompassing human-to-human exchanges and a vertical axis mapping human-to-divine relations. Prayerful actions always involve both dimensions. Within those dimensions, we can see prayer as “par excellence a ‘rhetoric of situation,’ a means for discerning and articulating placement, both in the particularity of immediate circumstance and in the broader cosmos, where discovering one’s place is the basis for ethical action” (12). Prayer thus becomes a rhetorical act that shapes character by orienting its performers toward future habits that represent their best communicative selves.
The next three chapters turn from prayer as situation to prayer as strategy in terms of three Burkean motives (scene, act, purpose). In treating prayer as a scene of address, Fitzgerald elaborates on the range of audiences present—human (including oneself) and divine—and how they are present. Dealing with prayer as a speech act, he locates its performative center in the rhetorical process of invocation, a calling upon some person or power to be present; in the course of his discussion, he briefly treats the ethics of invocation in the work Emmanuel Levinas, Jacques Derrida, and Jean-Luc Marion. In grounding prayer in an attitude of reverence, Fitzgerald foregrounds the psychosomatic dimension of prayer, its character as embodied performance, and the pious manner of that performance in the Burkean sense of piety: a sense of what is proper to the situation, in this case, the “gracious acceptance of hierarchal relations” (9). Fitzgerald illustrates his point through a contextualized reading of the Kwakiutl “Prayer to the Sockeye Salmon.”

After these three chapters organized around Burkean motives, Fitzgerald presents two chapters focused on the sometimes neglected fourth and fifth canons of classical rhetoric. He first views prayer as a rhetorical art of memory and reads a Catholic prayer, the Memorare, as an illustration of prayer’s rhetorical functioning as communication and commemoration. He next interprets prayer as delivery within the virtual context of contemporary cyberspace and provocatively argues that online prayer websites “actualize the logic already implicit in prayer as a virtual site of delivery” (128).

In his conclusion Fitzgerald turns to the topic and perspective of prayer in future rhetorical studies. “Does rhetoric have a prayer?” Fitzgerald asks. His affirmative answer includes suggestions for further exploration along the paths of rhetorical inquiry he has opened up. For example, having interpreted prayer primarily as a rhetoric of praise, he notes that one might alternatively read prayer as supplication or confession, a shift in emphasis that could result in quite different critical, theoretical, and historical conclusions. Fitzgerald’s grounding of prayer in the attitude of reverence presents another opportunity for further research: “A future focus for rhetoric is to locate and interrogate scenes of reverence in religious and secular guise and to advance a broader understanding of the place of reverence in human and divine affairs” (135). Though he does not point this out, Fitzgerald’s analyses also offer tools for historians of rhetoric examining past developments of prayer as a genre in different places and periods, and those same analyses demonstrate the way an understanding of the prayerful dimension of all discourse can affect rhetorical historiography more generally. For instance, Fitzgerald’s critical and theoretical perspectives on prayer can be developed by rhetorical historians of emotions to tell a different tale about how past rhetoricians have dealt with piety and pieties, with the affective disposition of habitual reverence and with the residue of such habits in the institutionally-protected practices of devotion. Armed with Fitzgerald’s dramatistic perspective on prayer and technology, historians of rhetoric can reinterpret past media revolutions and their ethical and political implications. These and other research opportunities suggest that Fitzgerald is correct in predicting that future rhetorical study does indeed have a prayer.

STEVEN MAILLOUX
Loyola Marymount University

Of the five monographs on Renaissance literature reviewed here, the three by Kathy Eden, William P. Weaver, and Daniel Derrin offer learned applications of the history of rhetoric to significant authors and genres of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, while the two by Catherine Nicholson and Roland Greene touch on rhetoric in examining early modern complexities of language as indicators of cultural tensions and changes.

Eden’s The Renaissance Rediscovery of Intimacy makes a significant contribution to the long-standing but frequently contested scholarly project of defining the Renaissance by the development of individualism. She reexamines the influence of classical authors on Petrarch, Erasmus, and Montaigne to trace their lineage in the rediscovery of what she calls throughout “a rhetoric and hermeneutics of intimacy,” that is, a style of intimate writing and reading, activities that Eden, following Hans-Georg Gadamer, sees as inseparable.

Focusing on familiar letters, Eden asserts that Petrarch’s “letter reading is rooted in the intimacy associated with friendship” (p. 67). Guided by the Senecan model, he transforms Cicero’s “rhetoric of intimacy” into “a hermeneutics of intimacy” by using the familiar letter to overcome not only physical distance (its chief function according to many ancient letter writers), but also temporal distance, in an effort “to understand his favorite ancient authors, whom he figures in epistolary terms as absent friends” (p. 69). Thus Petrarch, not Montaigne, was “individuality’s founding father” (p. 120). The emphasis