Loyola Student Takes Top Honors at ABA National Conference

The law student division of the American Bar Association (ABA/LSD) held its annual conference August 5th through 8th in Atlanta, Georgia. The four day conference was attended by more than 250 law school students representing virtually every law school in the nation. Yet amongst all the representatives in attendance, one name stood out -- Loyola Law School's Pezhman Ardalan.

Pez Ardalan, a fourth year evening student who served as the ABA/LSD's 9th Circuit Governor last year, received two of the top honors at the ABA awards banquet. He was first awarded with the Silver Key. This award was given for exceptional service and dedication to the ABA/LSD.

Additionally, Pez Ardalan accepted the Circuit of the Year Award for the 9th Circuit. This coveted award is given to the Governor of the best group of law schools in the nation. The 9th Circuit is currently comprised of all law schools in Southern California and Hawaii. In a teary-eyed acceptance, Pez thanked the former

Governors for laying the foundation for the 9th Circuit's success. "We wanted to transform this Circuit in to the model Circuit, and tonight, the goals we envisioned three years ago have been realized" said Ardalan as he addressed the assembly of law students at the awards banquet.

The 9th Circuit went on to win many more awards that night. The 9th Circuit took home awards for best SBA in the nation (Thomas Jefferson School of Law), best SBA President in the nation (Michelle Castillo, Thomas Jefferson), best VITA rookie site (Western State), and best SBA of the Western Region (Southwestern Law School).

The national conference provided law school students with many leadership, networking, and educational opportunities. The primary purpose of the conference is to pass resolutions affecting all U.S. law schools. The resolutions are then presented to the American Bar Association, and if adopted, are lobbied in Congress and the State Bars.

Additionally, many Loyola law students found time to attend workshops, lectures and special events. Two of the most notable of which were a dinner at the Jimmy Carter Museum and a luncheon with Atlanta Mayor Bill Campbell.

BOLOGNA, Italy – No matter where I went in Bologna, I ran smack into life— honking horns, traffic jams, rallies, strikes and fist-shaking store-keepers who yelled at each other one minute and were hugging the next. Although the midday three-hour siesta frustrated travel plans, and petty pickpocketings outnumbered tomatoes, Italy's my favorite craziest country in Europe.

While the Brooklyn Law School Summer Program at the University of Bologna was academically on par with a term here at Loyola, the program was easy: easy to get to know people, easy to absorb the material and easy to enjoy cuisine so perfected it's an art form. Classes offered were Comparative Business Organizations ("CBO") and International Arbitration, which began during the first week, and International Business Litigation which commence during the second week. Each course lasted two weeks.

The night before classes began, Arthur R. Pinto, co-Director from Brooklyn Law School and Professor Chiara

G. Orlandi, co-Director from University of Bologna, welcomed us to Bologna with food and wine at a local trattoria. Amidst the backdrop of fortresses and castles, Bologna dates back to the middle ages, when manly men donned chain mail and locals queued up for jousting contests. Today, it's a bustling college town that feels sort of like Berkeley.

Professor Pinto's class, CBO, began the next day. He is Professor of Law and co-Director of the Brooklyn Law School's Center for the Study of International Business Law. He reminded me of Woody Allen, but was a deadringer for Rick Moranis. One time Professor Pinto peeked in on International Arbitration asking if we were finished, and we could've sworn he said, "Honey, I shrunk the kids!"

CBO was an analysis of how Italian, German and French businesses deal with formation, structure and governance as compared to the United States. Professor Pinto presented the material in a clear and organized manner, and we made our own comparisons by living in Bologna and taking part in its commerce. During the first week of classes, Professor Pinto treated groups of students after class to his choice drink, Prosecco, similar to Champagne, at an outdoor café in Piazza Maggiore. The piazza, Bologna's main square, is earmarked by a large virile statue of Neptune,

REFLECTIONS ON THE MEDIATION CLINIC

By Professor Hobbs
Director of The Center For Conflict Resolution

These are the words of Trainees from among the over 240 public interest community organizations who have attended the Community Conflict Resolution Trainings offered by the on-campus Center For Conflict Resolution Mediation Clinic.

"Even though I have taken this class at a university, this is much better, more intense."

"The Training more than met my expectations. I now feel more confident that I will be able to resolve conflicts more effectively as a program person and in personal situations."

"It was above and beyond my expectations. It has helped me already in some conflicts in my life, and it has helped me to prevent other situations from becoming conflicts."

"It has exceeded my expectations. I was somewhat hesitant about attending, but I am very happy that I followed it through."

"I acquired very useful Training tools which I will be using not only in my job but also in my personal life."

"This Training woke me up! On the first day of Training, I went home and I rewrote my will."

"The Training was all that I expected, even more. I learned how to apply it to my personal life too. It has helped me to deal with many conflicts in a new way that really works."

"Sometimes I find myself in Trainings that I feel that I have not gotten too much out of. However, in this class, I have learned how to use information that I already knew but did not know how to use."

The Center is a year round public interest Clinic. You can take it for units, there are work-study positions, it satisfies your pro bono requirement and there are evening hours. You don't have to be bilingual, but Spanish and Armenian speakers are needed. Apply now with Bridget in Faculty Support (Burns 320).

surrounded by century-old fortresses and the Basilica of Saint Petronio — a huge, half finished, 14th-century church.

Professor Chiara G. Orlandi, taught International Arbitration. Her heavy Italian accent made us sit up straight and listen. She is also an Adjunct Professor of Civil Procedure at the University of Bologna. The class focused on the major differences between litigation and arbitration in the context of international disputes. She was a personable and approachable professor whose teaching tools included class debates and guest lecturers. Among them, Stefano Azzali, Vice-Secretary of the Milan National and International Chamber of Commerce, and Professor Franco Ferrari, a professor of Private Comparative Law at the University of Bologna. Their lectures were fascinating; they yanked the material right out of the book and made it real.

International Business Litigation, taught by Professor Lawrence B. Solum, analyzed the problems raised when international business disputes are litigated in United States courts. He is a Professor of Law and William M. Rains Fellow at Loyola Law School. Professor Solum had a pleasant teaching style. He assigned cases to students ahead of time, so that we could attend class prepared. Even if we were clueless, Professor Solum had a way of making incorrect answers sound brilliant. He treated us to fresh cookies and drinks everyday at class break -- and he knew the best gelato place in all of Bologna.

Besides the professors and interesting classes, University e-mail accounts were another key perk to the program. When we weren't in class, most of us were in the computer lab keeping in touch with the world back home. When we weren't e-mailing, Leonardo Graffi, a law student at the University and Professor Orlandi's summer assistant, squired us around town. Leo was a great resource for practical information and showed us the best restaurants, pub-crawls, discos, and sometimes took us off the beaten path...but that's another story.

The program included tours of the University, library, courthouse, medical school, cathedrals and churches of Bologna. During the courthouse tour, we witnessed firsthand the differences between the Italian legal system and our own. The accused stood in white prison garments, locked in a cage at the side of the courtroom grabbing the bars. He just stared at us with blank, remorseless eyes. He probably didn't appreciate us gazing back with our jaws dropped to the floor.

Something happens to students who go off-campus to learn in a foreign land. Personal barriers collapse, either from helping each other read a map, or just knowing we were all in the same foreign boat together. Many of the driven, career-focused law students loosen up. People we'd seen all year, yet had never spoken to, suddenly become easy to talk with. And, living abroad was an excuse for groups of students and professors to dine together regularly. The professor's perspective on students, teaching and class preparation made me realize that they are not trying to make our lives hell — for the most part — but encounter their own challenges in helping us learn. One suggestion...make it your goal to get to know a law professor, it will enhance your law school experience.

Overall, the summer program in Bologna was outstanding. It was headed by quality people who went out of their way to inform us about Italy and encouraged us to take advantage of our time abroad. Also, expenses were reasonable; most people paid $39 for room and breakfast, and $500 per class unit. Flights averaged between $750 - $1,500 depending on the itinerary.

Studying international legal material in a European setting made the information richer, relevant and very, very memorable. And, while I can't promise this experience to everyone, my adventure in Italy was extra special because I got engaged on a gondola in Venice.

The Beijing Blast

By Deborah M. Vaughn

The Beijing Summer Abroad Program began on July 25th with a traditional Chinese banquet. Beginning with the opening ceremonies, the theme of the program was set - drink a little, eat a little, make new friends and learn a lot. The two classes offered were International Products Liability and Comparative Securities Regulation, but the learning extended far beyond the classroom. The program was jointly sponsored by Loyola and Brooklyn Law Schools and hosted by UIBE, China's very prestigious University of International Business and Economics which houses the number one ranked law school in China.

The classroom was shared by 25 American law students and 25 Chinese law students. The classes were taught by Brooklyn Law professors, with the Dean of UIBE serving as guest lecturer. International Products Liability was taught by Professor Kuklin, an eminent Brooklyn Professor and tort expert, and Comparative Securities Regulation was taught by Professor Fanto, a former law clerk of Justice Blackmun and a distinguished expert in the field of securities. Additionally, the students were privileged to study Chinese securities under the direction of Dean Sibao. Mr. Sibao is not only a Dean and professor at UIBE, but he serves both as Vice Chairman of China's International Economics & Trade Arbitration Commission (CIETAC) and as a Qualified Arbitrator for the Grain and Feed Trade Association (GAFTA).

Classes began each morning at 9:00 a.m. and depending on the day, ended by either 12:00 p.m. or 2:00 p.m. (classes culminated earlier on the days that we had scheduled field trips). The inaugural Loyola & Brooklyn Class at UIBE felt honored to be hosted by the Supreme Court, the Beijing Jail, CIETAC, MOFTEC, and a local law firm. UIBE's strong ties to the Chinese legal community made these trips possible. At the Supreme Court, we toured the facilities and observed a trial in session. We also met with the Chief Justice of the Economics Division of the Court, who studied law at New York University School of Law. Sharing a cup of tea with the Chief Justice, he lead a discussion of the differences between the two legal systems. The similarities between the two systems were actually surprising to many of the Americans. China has an advanced system of appeals and judges are merely interpreters of the Codes. However, unlike the American system of justice, the Chinese legal system is not based on the theory of stare decisis. Thus, where a code has not been written for the particular case at hand, judges have a lot of discretion.

The Beijing Jail also welcomed us with a cup of tea, a welcome video, and a tour of the facilities. Many of the American students were surprised to see how many amenities the prisoners of the Beijing Jail were given. Each prisoner was given one fish and one plant. It was their responsibility to keep both the plant and the fish alive. This was done to teach the prisoners respect for life. In order to provide the inmates with the hope of a future after their release, there were many teaching classrooms and even a computer lab. Additionally, there was a library in which the inmates could study. The scenery at the prison was quite tranquil. Rose bushes adorned the walkways and paths of the jail, and the living quarters were not much worse than our hotel. Some students commented that the jail seemed too nice. However, even the prison guards admitted that not all jails resembled this model prison.

At CIETAC, the Arbitration Commission, we met with the Secretary General and discussed the Chinese system of arbitration. Lawyers from around the world serve as arbitrators for CIETAC. The decisions of the arbitrators are binding and are enforced by the Chinese courts. The majority of cases that end up at CIETAC are disputes between Chinese and foreign companies. Rather than try their hand at the complex Chinese legal system, foreign companies contract to dispute all disagreements through CIETAC. It is a budding, yet powerful commission of the Chinese government. At the Ministry of Foreign Trade and Economics, MOFTEC, we also met with high officials to discuss their role in foreign trade. MOFTEC regulates all foreign trade by both foreign and domestic companies. Our final field trip was to King & Wood, a local Chinese law firm. There, among others, we met and spoke with a female partner of the firm and local counsel who had trained at Loyola.

The field trips merited their own applause because it was through those visits that we truly learned about the local business and legal environment. However, our learning continued into every facet of local Beijing society. Hosted by our local counterparts, we found out what Beijing nightlife was really about. A typical evening would be spent dining in small groups of both UIBE and American students. After dinner, we would meet up in a larger group and go to a club or a local bar. A few nights, we enjoyed the traditional Chinese banquet as a large group. We drank with the professors, partied with the locals, and danced many nights away with our Chinese counterparts.

It never ceased to amaze me that, following a night of drinking, the Chinese students would still be on time for class the next morning and attentive during lecture. Meanwhile, the Americans tried to chalk up their tardiness to the never ending jet lag and their absenteeism to an ill stomach.

In sum, I can confidently state that this program changed all of our lives. Most people made friends for life, met contacts for the future, and broadened both their hearts and minds while enjoying two of the best weeks possible.

On hearing it said that they were drinking too much, the Justices of the Supreme Court decided they would henceforth drink nothing on their weekly consultations. Justice Story replied, "Mr. Chief Justice, I have very carefully examined this case, and I have to give it a dissenting opinion." Justice Marshall replied, "Justice Story, I think that is the shallowest and most illogical opinion have ever heard you deliver; you forget that

La Vida Loca! International Environmental Law in Costa Rica and Belize

By Cori Ferraro

We landed in San Jose, Costa Rica at 9:20a.m. Thursday morning, and fled from the diesel-choked city as quickly as possible. After a lengthy and sticky bus ride, Brett Harvey, Ali Jahangiri and I arrived at the coastal village of Manuel Antonio — a tropical paradise. We spent the next day exploring the seaside rain forest, where we became acquainted with a variety of sloths, iguanas, monkeys, and insects. After hours of hiking in 100% humidity and fragrant insect repellent, plunging into the ocean was heavenly.

Thanks to Mr. Jahangiri's bargaining skills, the following morning we embarked on what would have otherwise been a prohibitively expensive deep-sea fishing adventure. The men caught a yellow fin tuna, providing our next two meals, while I made myself comfortable leaning over the side of the boat. However, coming home to our poolside villa, hidden amid the flora, compensated for any discomfort I experienced that day.

Becoming so enamored with jungle life and town locals, we forgot to purchase bus tickets back to San Jose for our first class meeting Monday morning. But, as luck would have it, we had recently befriended a taxi driver named Jorge. He picked us up at 5:00am and we were on our way. We arrived at the Universidad de Costa Rica an hour late. To my relief, Professor Findley was most understanding.

Despite our displeasure with San Jose's air pollution and abundance of pickpockets, we soon began to appreciate the city for its food, its Internet access and most of all its nightlife. While our priority was, undoubtedly, cultivating a solid understanding of international environmental law and "sustainable development," we managed to tear ourselves away from the books on occasion. Offering a variety of Latin and American dance music as well as cheap beer, the clubs became home away from home for most of the students.

All joking aside, Professor Findley's

International Environmental Law class was fascinating, thought provoking, and very well presented. He and program director/environmental attorney, Emily Yozell, lectured in tandem and complemented one another quite well. We also received several guest speakers, ranging from Costa Rican government officials to radical conservationists. After two weeks in San Jose, we traveled to Belize for the field trip portion of the program. This brought the material to a practical and more personal level.

Belize, in fact, proved to be the highlight of the trip. With some students more eager than others to leave our Costa Rican families, we departed from San Jose airport at the crack of dawn Saturday morning. Upon arriving in Belize City, we caught a water-taxi to Ambergris Caye, where we spent the weekend snorkeling and napping in seaside hammocks. We reunited with the group on Monday and traveled around Belize for the next five days visiting grassroots organizations. This provided an opportunity to witness the conservation efforts we had discussed in lecture as well as the physical beauty of Belize. Visiting the Rain Forest Medicine Trail, where we discovered the medicinal value of rain forest biodiversity, was one of my favorite excursions.

The program ended on Friday in the Mayan ruins of Cahal Pech, and we went our separate ways before returning to Belize City for Monday morning's final exam. Many returned to the cayes, others visited Mayan ruins in Tikal, and then there were the dedicated few who did nothing but outline all weekend.

This was an academically and emotionally gratifying experience. It was also a relatively economical way to earn four units. Furthermore, it was a fabulous vacation. I highly recommend the program, particularly to those who have yet to visit a developing country, and to those who need a dose of the simple life.

litigation day unless it was raining. The following consultation day Justice John Marshall asked Justice Story to go to the window and see if there was any sign of rain. "As my opinion that there is not the slightest sign of rain." Not content with the assessment of the situation at our jurisdiction is as broad as the Republic, and by the laws of nature it must be raining some place in our jurisdiction. Waiter, bring on the rum!"

Current and Former Loyola Law School Students Campaign for Local School Board Election Candidate

By Joel Epstein

With an increasing number of reports indicating that our public schools are failing society and its children, current and former Loyola Law Students have organized to support the reformation of a local school board. Current Day-SBA President Gil Serrano, former La Raza President Javier Aguirre and Loyola Alumni Lucia Gonzalez have allied with several Lynwood organizations to elect Maria Medina to the Lynwood Board of Education.

Their involvement in the upcoming November 2nd election reflects a growing trend of grass-roots organizing to reform California's educational system. According to Maria Medina, "Many of the current school board members have forgotten that they were not elected to play out adult agendas, but rather to serve the needs of Lynwood's children."

Lynwood Unified, like many inner city districts, is mired in an array of problems that many in the community feel arise from the top of the beauracratic hierarchy. Years of political infighting and lack of direction have left Lynwood's children at a severe disadvantage. Seventy percent of the nation's children score at a higher level than Lynwood students and only 35% of Lynwood High students plan to pursue higher education.

Maria Medina grew up in Lynwood and attended Lynwood schools: Lincoln Elementary 1982-1988; Hosler Jr. High School 1989-1990; Lynwood High School 1991-1995. She then attended Stanford University where she majored in Public Policy and minored in Economics. After completing her term on the Board of Education, Medina plans to further her education at Loyola Law School.

Javier Aguirre, Lucia Gonzalez, and Gil Serrano have contributed to the campaign by formulating an election strategy and organizing fundraising events. According to Javier Aguirre "Maria is an exceptional candidate because of her conviction and qualifications. I have known her since college and when she announced her candidacy, I immediately volunteered to help."
