September 17th looked like an ordinary Friday at Loyola, except for an abundance of secret service men and bright yellow police tape blocking the first three levels of the parking structure. First glance revealed a small stage and several rows of chairs under a white tent on the lawn in front of Founders Hall. Ireland's flag flew gently in the breeze flanked by the Stars and Stripes and California's flag.

The day's activities were twofold: the dedication of Founders Hall and the bestowing of an Honorary Doctor of Laws degree on Ireland's President, Her Excellency Mary McAleese. Students, alumni, faculty and distinguished guests gathered to celebrate the generosity of the Fritz B. Burns Foundation, and to have the honor of hearing the inspirational speech given by President McAleese.

The morning began with a private reception hosted by the newly inaugurated President of Loyola Marymount University, Robert B. Lawton, S.J. and Loyola Law School's Dean Gerald T. McLaughlin. A ribbon cutting ceremony followed the reception officially naming the student services building Founders Hall. Outside, the unmistakable sound of Irish bagpipes broke through the misty morning air as four men dressed in green plaid kilts led a procession into the tent.

A small but distinguished group of presidents and deans took their place on stage for the ceremony. Father James T. Erys blessed the event and Dean McLaughlin made opening remarks on the accomplishments of the guest of honor, President Mary McAleese. With the help of Father Lawton and Registrar Chris Butzen, President McAleese received her purple and red graduate hood and diploma.

As she began speaking into the microphone, her soft Irish lilts and powerful speech quickly made it apparent that President McAleese is no average graduate. She had a

WILLIAM M. RAINS LIBRARY—With hard hats and closed-toe shoes, we entered the almost hollow structure. Tiptoeing over plastic pieces and wires, my enthusiasm sizzled. But, as Professor Robert J. Nissenbaum, Law Library Director, spoke of the media room with cable television and a DVD player, internet access at every seat, comfortable lounge furniture and free Loyola Law School computer mugs, my enthusiasm sizzled.

The William M. Rains Library was built in 1964, and this is the second major renovation and is costing upwards of about five million dollars. Among the many reasons for the renovation is the need to make the library technologically friendly. The old building had encapsulated asbestos. Any time a wire had to be replaced, asbestos abatement had to be conducted. Since asbestos abatement takes several weeks, it was increasingly difficult to meet the changing technological needs of the student body.

Second, one of the agencies that accredits Loyola, the Association of American Law Schools ("AALS"), changed their accreditation standard from quantitative to qualitative. The old standard required sixty five percent seating for the largest division of the student body. Now, the AALS mandates roomy study areas with good quality seating. The library met the seating requirement, but the carrels and tables did not allow ample space for books and study materials.

The new library will have about five hundred and fifty large, generous seats, all of which will be connected to the internet, have task lighting, electrical outlets and extra shelf space for books.

Other exciting features include a large, open student lounge area with a skylight, and comfortable couches and chairs with magazines and internet access. If a student has an Ethernet card, a laptop computer and a network account with the law school, they can relax and surf the net from practical any seat in the library.

There will be twenty student group-study rooms overall. Most rooms accommodate four people, but room sizes vary. One room will hold up to ten. The ugly brown paper that used to cover the glass will be replaced with special glass. One switch from the Circulation Desk makes the glass clear or opaque. So you had better behave.... Just around the corner from the circulation desk is the microfiche room, which boasts cable television and a DVD player.

Four new computer labs with large drop-down audiovisual screens will provide what Professor Nissenbaum calls the "audiovisual hocus-pocus." These screens allow Lexis Nexis and Westlaw to train in four rooms at the same time. Legal research training will only take a few weeks because all four rooms can be trained at once.

November 1, 1999 marks the grand re-opening of the new library. The weekend prior, Halloween weekend, 25,000 boxes of books that are being stored in Orange County will be returned, alphabetized and shelved. These dates are, however, subject to change. This
Abortion and Crime Decrease Linked in Study

By Tony Zaller

Short from achieving the impossible. John Donohue and Steven Levitt have published a paper which has managed to draw criticism from both liberals and conservatives. The two professors, from Stanford Law School and the University of Chicago respectively, contend that the declining crime rate in the 1990s is attributable to the Supreme Court's 1973 Roe v. Wade decision to legalize abortion. Addressing one of the most emotional issues of debate today, the study must be examined for its factual accuracy as well as moral consequences, rather than for the conclusion it promotes.

Donohue and Levitt argue that legalizing abortion has resulted in the birth of fewer unwanted babies. The professors contend that because there is a higher risk of unwanted children becoming criminals, due to lack of nurturing and possible abuse, the fewer of these pregnancies carried to term, the fewer criminals there will be. On the surface, this Orwellian argument seems reasonable.

As I said, the study seems reasonable, but there is something that disturbs many of us about the study's findings, and various groups have voiced their opposition to its conclusion. The study invites three areas of reproach.

First, the study's statistical evidence is subject to criticism. Steve Salter, in the popular on-line magazine Slate, observes that if the professors' conclusions are correct (i.e., that there is in fact a causal link between abortion and the crime rate), society would see crime decline in the 15 to 20 year old age group. This is the age group that as a result of post-1973 abortions would be free of unwanted babies. However, Salter argues that the country's recent crime decline is due to a decrease in criminal activities of people between the ages of 35 to 49. Based on this, there appears to be no connection between the decrease in crime and legalization of abortion.

The second critique of the study is that it has been used by some to strengthen racist stereotypes. Although the authors of the study have adamantly stated that their study does not promote any conclusions of this type, civil rights advocates oppose the conclusions drawn because they can be easily used to promote racist sentiment in America. For instance, Richard Banks, a law professor at Stanford University and a colleague of Donohue, said the study was, "[Y]et another veiled expression of the sentiment. It seems reasonable, but there are questions that we must ask ourselves about these conclusions."

The study's conclusions have been hailed by some as further proof that the country is in fact a better place because of Roe v. Wade. Others, however, have called for a return to the pre-abortion period. The study's findings have been described as "progressive" by those on the left, and "regressive" by those on the right.

The study's conclusion has been met with mixed reactions. Some have hailed it as evidence that Roe v. Wade was a good move. Others have criticized it as proof that abortion is responsible for lower crime rates. Still others, like John Corr, a law professor at Stanford University, have argued that the study's conclusions are not supported by the data.

President McAleese also emphasized the changing role of educators in today’s society. McAleese believes that education is not just conveying technical skills, but instead, in planning our education programs, the focus should shift from information to ideas, from knowledge to skills. McAleese gave the example of two different approaches to teaching, one that emphasizes rote learning and the other that encourages students to think critically and creatively.

Speaking of whiz-kid lawyers, President McAleese graduated from Queen’s University Belfast and was called to the Northern Ireland Bar, practicing mainly criminal and family law. She was appointed Professor of Criminal Law in 1975 at Trinity College Dublin and later was appointed Pro-Vice Chancellor of Queen’s University Belfast. With the odds against her, Ms. McAleese ran for office and was inaugurated as Ireland’s eighth President on November 11, 1997.

In closing, McAleese spoke of the coming century saying, "The way we educate our young people will determine the shape of the world." Instead of continuing to produce closed minds and closed hearts, President McAleese wants to use education to "[inspire] confidence, a sense of wonder about the world, and a joyful curiosity about each other." According to President McAleese, by appreciating and giving back to the community, we can truly make a difference in the coming century.

The second, third and fourth floors of the temporary library, a.k.a. Darling Pavilion, currently supports the first year legal research program. It is housing a small selection of the National Reporter System, the American Law Treatise collection, a selection of periodicals and the California legal research collection along with the reserve and reference collections. It will be closed for the week beginning Nov 1st to breakdown the renovation’s temporary facilities. Darling Pavilion will no longer be devoted to foreign law materials, but to periodicals.

Finally, the study ignores the moral debate surrounding abortion by focusing solely on a potential by-product abortion may achieve. Our nation’s decision whether or not to continue allowing abortions should be made strictly on a moral basis. If a fetus is considered to be a life, then that life should be protected from the wishes and desires of others, even its mother’s. If, on the other hand, a fetus is not considered to be a life, then there can be no moral hard questions and deal with difficult issues comfortably. She said that while it is important to praise the “whiz-kid lawyers,” we must always maintain respect for well-rounded people from all disciplines.

Of course, to most of the public, the problem was not too little independence but too much. The seemingly unlimited power of the IC’s power runs against our tradition of limited government. Indeed, the more the IC’s efforts to track down every relevant fact, the greater the opportunity for the Executive to complain about prosecutorial overreaching. Moreover, in the court of public opinion, the executive will have the advantage of a fully staffed public relations machine.

And, in the end, it was public opinion that brought down the statute. Wearied by the impeachment trial, and facing a constituency convinced that the Starr investigation has gone too far for too little, Congress was in no mood to salvage the IC law. Which is why Ann Curry’s mistake was ironically appropriate. It isn’t Kent Starr who believes his investigation has gone on too long; it is most of the media... and most of us.

The entering class of 1999

Interview with the Assistant Dean for Admissions

By Yalda Yousefi

September 16, 1999, exactly one month after the first day of Orientation, I entered Anton Powell Mack’s office to interview him about this year’s entering class. As a 1L myself, I was not sure what to expect. To my delight, I found that Dean Mack was quite passionate about the admissions process and the new group of students.

Loyola has seen a very rapid growth in admissions applications over the past few years. This year Loyola received 3100 applications, the same as last year, and was admitted with 1246 seats. Eighty percent of the students in the entering class are from outside of California. Forty-eight percent of these students are graduates of the UC system, with UCLA leading in first place with nearly 100 students. Great emphasis is given to a student’s writing ability, through evaluation of personal statements and, in some cases, the writing sample on the LSAT. Students were also anxious to stress the importance of their personal traits to the student’s character. The Admissions Committee recognizes that an exceptional student is able to maintain good grades while devoting a great amount of time to activities unrelated to school.

The varied abilities and diversity of Loyola’s new students are impressive and refreshing. The entering class includes seven students with terminal degrees (i.e., doctors of philosophy, engineering, architecture, and others). While it finds that Loyola students have always been very bright, this year’s entering class was the most academically competitive and very professionally prepared in their interaction with both the staff and other students.

Serrano seconded, “Take advantage of the Loyola community. It’s not just what you learn, it’s the people from whom you learn. If you enjoy the people you’re around, law school is much easier and more fun.” It even lays the foundation for future success. As Zee noted, “Every friend you make in law school can help you later. The worst thing is to be too competitive. If someone asks for your help, help him.”

What’s the best way to mentally get ready for exam season? Simone Schiller (2nd year) suggested changing studying efforts in early November. “Get in exam mode one month before exams. Focus on this more than on preparing for class daily. For that last month, really concentrate and let the concepts soak in. Also, focus on the professor’s words in class rather than the students’ thoughts,” since it is the professor’s information on which you will be tested. Matt Davis (2nd year) agreed with this method of planning ahead. “Get in exam mode early. Don’t hang on every word in class – instead, really focus on learning the concepts of the law.”

Yasuhara said, “Don’t believe or buy into the hype as exams approach. People will say they’re studying 12 hours a day, but they may only be trying to psyche you out. Don’t buy into the mass panic or the sense of competition.”

As for how to prepare for exams, Bob Sievers (2nd year) suggested, “Don’t tear your hair out over details of each case. Instead, focus on the case’s larger perspective: understand the strings of cases and examine each case in the string fits with the others and builds upon earlier cases in the string.”

Serrano recommended pulling professors’ old exams from the library, writing your answers to the questions and asking the professors to review your answers with you. “This will ensure you are on the right path and ready for the exam.” Price urged, “Take an exam-writing class – it will teach you how to match elements with facts,” and thus perform better on exams.

Before, during, and after exams, Sievers urged, “Try hard not to think of your grade as being indicative of your future ability as a lawyer – people who internalize it if they don’t make the top 10% often stop putting in the required time and work, and really hurt themselves later.”

With any luck, implement these suggestions and philosophies will make our first year a little easier.
On hearing it said that they were drinking too much, the Justices of the Supreme Court decided they would henceforth drink nothing on their weekly consultant. Justice Story replied, "Mr. Chief Justice, I have very carefully examined this case, and I have to give it as I find it." Justice Marshall replied. "I think that is the shallowest and most illogical opinion I have ever heard you deliver; you forget that..."

Artist Profile:
Julie Bachman

By Regis Guerin

I interviewed 3rd year Loyola student Julie Bachman at the Coffee Table (located at 2930 Rowena Ave. in Silverlake). Here is what transpired...

Regis: So you have been playing in various groups for a while now, can you give those ignorant to the punk rock scene a little background on some of your previous bands?

Julie: Uhh, the first band that I played in was called Ballaguage a 50-S thin girl style band. It was an all girl band and we released on full length and were on 8 compilation records and did two tours. We started playing in 1994 and retired in 1998. We all just kinda went our separate ways after the band ran its course. We all wanted to do something different. The current band is called Snack Cake. It is another all girl but not as punk rock as Ballaguage, more like Elastica meets Sonic Youth with a splash of the Go-Go's. I am also going on tour with the Neptunas, an all girl surfband with two full-length releases. We are going to Belgium and Holland (don't tell my professors) in October.

Regis: Do you like cheese pizza?

Julie: Yes, extra cheese. Who doesn't you jack-ass!

Regis: What are the goals for the band?

Julie: Just to play and have fun. Tour and record. Corporate sponsorship and selling out (that was a joke ... hopefully). It's just fun to start playing again.

Regis: Do you like Jar Jar Binks?

Julie: I thought it was a pretty stupid character, but it fit with the rest of the movie, and I am sick of hearing people debating the issue. I was at a party and those frat guys were debating that very issue and I felt like I was transported into an episode of Friends.

Regis: What is the current line-up of the Snack Cake?

Julie: I play the guitar and sing, my friend Leslie plays that guitar and sings as well, Heather plays the bass and my sister Laura plays the drums.

Regis: Who is responsible in Snack Cake for the song-writing?

Julie: I bear the majority of the responsibility but Leslie writes some of the songs as well. Whoever writes the songs usually writes the lyrics. We have about ten songs and I have written about eight of them.

Regis: Who are your influences musically?

Julie: Tom Waits, Elvis Costello, Chrissy Hynde, Beach Boys, The Descendants, Billy Bragg, Mozart, Coltrane, Miles Davis, the Clash, etc. The best local bands are Miss Spiritual Tramp of 1948, and Tsar, catch them at small clubs while you can. Pennywise are cool, and of course Chorus of Disapproval.

Regis: Have you tried the blended mocha here at the Coffee Table?

Julie: Yes, the blended mocha kicks ass!

Regis: So what are some of the songs about?

Julie: Uhh, maybe the next song. Most are about failed romantic involvement and my emotional outbursts in response.

Regis: Any shows coming up?

Julie: Snack Cake is playing at Ai's bar on October 7. Check out the website for more information.

Regis: How was your previous band, Ballaguage?

Julie: Didn't anybody, but yea Law School is like a hobby for me. No, I wrote on like the rest of you losers.

Regis: Who has been your favorite professor thus far? Favorite class?

Julie: Professor Murray is pretty rad! I taught feminist jurisprudence and I learned a lot from her. I really respect her for being so accomplished at such a young age. Feminist jurisprudence was my favorite class because all the comments from the men showed how little they know about women's issues. It was kinda funny.

Regis: Any advice for the little first year puppies?

Julie: Quit now while you can still get a refund! If not study your little buns off.

Regis: Where is the war?

Julie: In my head!

Live Music Review:
Bluetip, The Locust,
and At The Drive In

By Regis Guerin

With summer winding down and the school year starting up, I decided to take in a little indie rock before the books got too heavy. So I called my partner and we made the trek out to Pomona's Glass House to see Bluetip, the Locust, and At The Drive In.

Bluetip are a fancy little group from D.C. and have two releases on Dischord Records. I have seen them twice before (behind the Orange Curtain of course) and it is a good thing that I have seen them before because it took so long to get to Pomona that we missed them. But I am sure that they rocked. If you like Fugazi, you will love Bluetip.

The Locust are a bunch of little guys that play loud, fast punk style music with new school screaming vocals to match. "They are pretty much all schtick as their songs last about 1 minute each. The new school scream vocals are pretty neat for the first couple of songs, but then you wind up craving an advil or two by the end of the night.

At The Drive In hail from the great state of Texas. I thought that they were trying their hand at avant guard punk/pop etc., arriving at the conclusion primarily based on the singer and guitar player's crazy Dwayne from What's Happening style afros. However, after about ten minutes of listening, I realized that there was some substance here. At The Drive In's energy never waned throughout their entire set, and the crowd really appreciated the performance. They saved their best song, Rascalucie, for later in the set and it was quite a treat for the young emo-kids in attendance.

Overall, this was a good show, but there was no circle pit, thus it gets three stars out of a possible five.

If you don't care for this type of music or would like to review a band that you prefer, please contact Regis Guerin at the Loyola Reporter Office at (213) 736-8117.

Book Review:

By the Light of My Father's Smile

By Cori Ferraro

By the Light of My Father's Smile is Alice Walker's first novel in six years. The story begins after two young sisters, Magdalena and Susannah, are taken by their anthropologist parents to live in the Mexican Sierra among the Mando, descendants of Mexican Indians and escaped slaves. When their father discovers Magdalena's love affair with a young man from the tribe, Manuelito, he brutally punishes her, scarring her and all members of the family forever. The novel follows the lives of Magdalena and Susannah after this pivotal childhood event, and is noted by many characters, including the sisters and their deceased father who, as an angel, observes his daughters as he strives to make amends. Susannah becomes a writer and falls in love with Pauline, who, like Magdalena, punishes Susannah for the idol childhood she believes Susannah has had. Magdalena becomes a professor, and finds that overeating gives her power, comfort, and a tangible reminder of her anger toward her father, and what he stole from her.

Susannah and Magdalena share many intimate moments, but both realize that their love for one another was destroyed years ago, replaced by jealousy, manipulation, and resentment. Among the varied themes present in this rich novel, Walker emphasizes how essential it is to female development that fathers accept and embrace their daughters' sexuality. Walker also reminds us of the healing and liberating power of self-forgiveness and forgiveness of others.

Alice Walker is best known for her Pulitzer Prize winning novel The Color Purple. My personal favorites are Possessing the Secret of Joy and The Temple of My Familiar.
