A Shakeup for the Duty of Confidentiality: The Competing Priorities of a Government Attorney in California

I. INTRODUCTION

In the early hours of January 17, 1994, a 6.7 magnitude earthquake struck the Los Angeles area, killing 72 people and injuring 1,500.1 92 percent of the structural damage affected apartment buildings.2 The Northridge quake was the most expensive disaster California had endured at that time, causing $27 billion in building damage.3 In its aftermath, victims filed more than 600,000 insurance claims.4 After having paid for earthquake insurance year after year, many of these policyholders were severely shortchanged when insurance companies mishandled their cases and denied their claims.5

Consistent with its mission of protecting consumer interests,6 the California Department of Insurance ("CDI") investigated how several insurance companies adjudicated these claims and concluded that the companies had not complied with insurance regulations.\footnote{COMM. ON PROF’L RESPONSIBILITY & CONDUCT, STATE BAR OF CAL., REPORT AND RECOMMENDATION ON AB 363, AT 4 (2001), \textit{available at} http://calbar.ca.gov/calbar/pdfs/3cp0107c.pdf [hereinafter COPRAC REPORT].}

Instead of fining the companies and forcing them to pay restitution to the wronged earthquake victims, however, Insurance Commissioner Charles Quackenbush settled with the companies by allowing them to make nominal, tax-exempt “donations” to nonprofit organizations.\footnote{Ossias, \textit{supra} note 5.}

Then, a CDI employee named Cindy Ossias blew the whistle, exposing the truth about Quackenbush’s donation scheme.\footnote{Id.} When the California State Assembly Committee on Insurance ("Insurance Committee") asked Ossias about the dubious settlements, she handed over internal CDI documents.\footnote{Id.} Partially as a result of her actions, testimony before lawmakers revealed that the insurance commissioner had failed to sufficiently discipline the insurance companies and, worse yet, used the settlement funds for personal gain.\footnote{Iñiguez, \textit{supra} note 3.} Quackenbush eventually resigned.\footnote{Virginia Ellis, \textit{State Insurance Dept. Reinstates Whistle-Blower}, L.A. TIMES, Aug. 13, 2000, at A33 [hereinafter Ellis, \textit{Insurance Dept. Reinstates Whistle-Blower}].}

If Ossias had been a CDI research analyst, secretary, or investigator, she would have quietly returned to work because California’s whistleblower statutes protect employees from employment retaliation.\footnote{See CAL. GOV’T CODE §§ 8547.8, 53298 (West 2007).} Because Ossias was a CDI attorney, however, she was far from off the hook. The State Bar of California\footnote{All references to the legislature, state bar, or supreme court relate to California entities unless otherwise noted.} began to investigate whether she had violated her duty of confidentiality by revealing the documents to the legislature.\footnote{RICHARD A. ZITRIN & CAROL M. LANGFORD, LEGAL ETHICS IN THE PRACTICE OF LAW 550 (2d ed. 2001).} By favoring her duty to serve the public over whatever duty of confidentiality she may have owed to her “client,” Ossias almost lost her ability to practice law.

Government attorneys in California are caught between competing policies. On one hand, as government employees, they are encouraged by the whistleblower protection statutes to report misconduct in their departments. On the other, as attorneys, they have sworn to maintain their clients’ confidentiality. This tension forces a government attorney who has witnessed wrongdoing to choose between her desire to serve the public and her ethical obligations as a lawyer.

After the Ossias affair, both the legislature and the state bar recognized the need to clarify when and how a government attorney can safely blow the whistle on official misconduct without risking her ability to practice law. After several attempts, however, no new rules or laws have been passed. While ultimately no action was taken against Ossias, the bar prosecutor made it clear that his decision to drop the case was not precedent. As a result, a government attorney contemplating whether to blow the whistle in the future would face the same uncertainty as Ossias but might instead decline to disclose the wrongdoing, allowing the harm to continue. Who knows how many other government attorneys have chosen to remain silent to the detriment of the public good?

This Note explores the tension between the competing policies of government transparency and client confidentiality, ultimately proposing a way for the California Supreme Court to better address this issue. Part II will discuss the factual background of the Ossias affair. Part III will examine the current legal framework governing whistleblower protections and the duty of confidentiality. Part IV

16. See infra Part IV.C. The question of to whom a government attorney owes the duty of confidentiality is far from clear in California. Depending on how one defines the government “client,” it is very possible that Ossias did not violate her duty of confidentiality.

will consider how this framework fails to meet the ethical concerns of government attorneys. Part V will propose solutions that reconcile these problems without compromising the traditional division of labor between the legislature and the judiciary.

II. FACTUAL BACKGROUND

A. The Ground Shakes at the Department of Insurance

After the Northridge earthquake, the CDI investigated how several insurance companies evaluated claims and concluded that the claim practices did not comply with insurance regulations. CDI attorneys and examiners compiled grievances against the insurance companies into confidential internal reports called “market conduct examination reports” (“MCE Reports”).

CDI attorney Cindy Ossias participated in preparing the MCE Reports. She and her colleagues found that the insurance companies had mistreated policyholders by conducting cursory damage inspections, making insufficient settlement offers to pay for repairs, unreasonably delaying payments, and then denying supplemental claims based on an alleged expiration of the statute of limitations. As a result, CDI staff members recommended that the companies pay multimillion-dollar fines and restitution to claimants.

Instead of commencing legal action against the insurance companies, Insurance Commissioner Charles Quackenbush settled with the companies. Quackenbush agreed not to impose fines or complete the MCE Reports if the insurers would make donations to charitable foundations dedicated to earthquake education and relief.\textsuperscript{29} These donations totaled $12 million and were tax-deductible.\textsuperscript{30}

When Ossias and her colleagues noticed the large discrepancy between the penalties they recommended and the tax-deductible donations represented in the settlement agreements, they were "appalled."\textsuperscript{31} Both the Los Angeles Times and the legislature also noticed the suspicious settlement terms and began investigating Quackenbush's actions.\textsuperscript{32} In January 2000, when a consultant to the chairman of the Insurance Committee asked Ossias whether she knew anything about the settlements, she "put him off at first, grappled with [her] conscience and then offered him the [market conduct examination] reports."\textsuperscript{33} Once Ossias turned over the reports, the Insurance Committee revealed them to the public by posting salient portions of them on the Internet.\textsuperscript{34} In the course of a department-wide investigation that Quackenbush initiated,\textsuperscript{35} Ossias admitted during an "interview/interrogation" that she was the whistleblower.\textsuperscript{36} The next day, department management ordered her to "vacate the premises immediately" and take administrative leave.\textsuperscript{37}

Once the legislature and the California Attorney General began to investigate the matter, information about Quackenbush's political and personal involvement with those charitable foundations receiving "donations" began to surface.\textsuperscript{38} Testimony revealed that the "commissioner personally ordered his staff to collect $4 million in settlements with title insurance companies for TV commercials
Two days later, on June 28, 2000, Quackenbush announced his resignation. Quackenbush's successor in August 2000 and continues to work at the CDI today. Ossias was not fired as a result of her actions because California whistleblower laws protect government employees from retaliation. However, Ossias's status as an attorney was threatened when the California State Bar's Office of Trial Counsel began investigating whether her disclosure of confidential material merited disciplinary measures. Eventually, the state bar discontinued the investigation without determining whether Ossias acted unethically. In a letter to Ossias's attorney, the state bar prosecutor never specified who was Ossias's client or whether she had breached her duty of confidentiality. Ossias was forced to choose between her desire to report government wrongdoing and her binding ethical duty as an attorney to maintain client confidentiality. Because attorney conduct is governed both by statute and Rules of Professional Conduct promulgated by the California Bar and approved by the California Supreme Court, both the legislature and the state bar considered ways to clarify the relationship between the policy for government transparency and a government attorney's duty of confidentiality.
DUTY OF CONFIDENTIALITY

B. The Legislature and Bar

Try to Pick Up the Pieces

Soon after the Ossias investigation, Assemblyman Darrel Steinberg (D-Sacramento) proposed Assembly Bill 363 (“A.B. 363”), which would create an exception to the duty of confidentiality enumerated in section 6068(e) of the California Business and Professions Code.52 The bill was drafted to protect government lawyers in California from the threat of losing their bar licenses when they revealed confidential information to expose wrongdoing.53 While the assembly was considering A.B. 363, Assemblyman Steinberg requested that the attorney general’s office comment on whether “‘whistleblower’ statutory protections applicable to employees of state and local public entities supersede the statutes and rules governing the attorney-client privilege[].”54 The opinion concluded that the legislature, in passing the whistleblower statutes, did not intend to override the ethics provisions governing attorney-client privilege.55

The assembly passed A.B. 363 and the California Senate’s Subcommittee on the Judiciary took it under submission.56 Soon, the state bar became interested in the possibility of amending the Rules of Professional Conduct, instead of the Business and Professions Code.57 On July 9, 2001, the senate suspended its hearings to allow the bar to conduct its own study of how A.B. 363 might impact government lawyers.58

The California Bar’s Committee on Professional Responsibility and Conduct (“COPRAC”) determined that, instead of a statutory exception, it would be more effective for the California Supreme Court to amend Rule of Professional Conduct 3-600, titled “Organization as Client,” to specifically address the needs of government attorneys.\textsuperscript{59} The California State Bar’s Board of Governors adopted the change and sent it to the California Supreme Court for approval.\textsuperscript{60} The supreme court, in a terse opinion, denied the request on the grounds that “the proposed modifications conflict with Business and Professions Code section 6068, subdivision (e).”\textsuperscript{61}

After the supreme court denied the request to modify the Rules of Professional Conduct, the senate resumed its debate of A.B. 363 and eventually passed a bill containing a statutory exception to the duty of confidentiality for government attorneys.\textsuperscript{62} However, Governor Gray Davis vetoed the bill, fearing that the attorney-client relationship would be weakened by the exception.\textsuperscript{63} After Governor Arnold Schwarzenegger took office, Assemblywoman Fran Pavley introduced a new incarnation of A.B. 363 that also passed both houses with bipartisan support.\textsuperscript{64} On September 28, 2004, Governor Schwarzenegger vetoed the bill, arguing that government officials would react to the new policy by leaving government attorneys out of the decision-making process.\textsuperscript{65} In 2006, Pavley introduced

Despite the strong political will to clarify the priorities of a government attorney, the momentum incited by Cindy Ossias' experience has reached an impasse. The next part of this Note will evaluate the existing legal framework that creates these conflicting messages of transparency and secrecy.

III. EXISTING LEGAL FRAMEWORK

Government attorneys in California are caught between two contradictory sets of laws. On one hand, whistleblower statutes promote transparency in government, while on the other, the rules and statutes governing legal ethics require that attorneys keep client information confidential. The whistleblower statutes are not mandatory but rather encourage government workers to disclose "improper governmental activities" by protecting them from retribution. In contrast, all lawyers must comply with the provisions that address confidentiality, and any deviation could subject an attorney to discipline by the state bar. The only safe course of action for an attorney in Cindy Ossias's position is to maintain the government "client's" absolute confidentiality. This situation, however, means that the whistleblower statutes effectively

The state bar firmly opposed this proposed exception to the duty of confidentiality because it felt that the duty was being threatened by exceptions to the duty enacted under Federal law and in the American Bar Association's Model Rules of Professional Conduct. do not apply to government attorneys. As a result, the legislature’s goal of promoting transparency in government is consistently overshadowed by the duty of confidentiality. In the following discussion, this Part will set forth the competing policies of government transparency and client confidentiality.

A. The Whistleblower Statutes

Whistleblowing is considered to be a form of internal dissent, whereby a member of an organization speaks out against wrongdoing. Statutes that encourage whistleblowing are intended to promote a government employee’s ethical duty to expose “waste, fraud, and abuse.” Whistleblowers are an integral part of the system of checks and balances; they sound the alarm when individuals or government entities threaten to overstep their authority. Moreover, these statutes have a deterrent effect on misconduct. Faced with the possibility of exposure, an official would be reticent to abuse his power because it would be harder to hide.

Although whistleblower-type protections trace back to the Civil War era, officials have been concerned about public cynicism and distrust of the government since the 1960s. Modern whistleblower protections are one way to improve the public’s perception of the government. The fact that many states and the federal government have enacted whistleblower statutes reflects a widespread commitment to this policy.

There are several provisions scattered throughout the California Government Code that provide guidance to whistleblowers. The California Whistleblower Protection Act\(^\text{83}\) codifies the legislature’s finding that “public servants best serve the citizenry when they can be candid and honest without reservation in conducting the people’s business.”\(^\text{84}\) An employee is authorized to disclose improper behavior that violates any law or regulation, or “is economically wasteful, or involves gross misconduct, incompetency, or inefficiency.”\(^\text{85}\) Upon receiving information about improper behavior, the state auditor\(^\text{86}\) is empowered to investigate the issue and report to the appropriate oversight body.\(^\text{87}\) The whistleblower often remains anonymous.\(^\text{88}\) Moreover, the statutes expressly prohibit employees from intimidating or retaliating against the whistleblower.\(^\text{89}\)

The Whistleblower Protection Act applies to all individuals “appointed by the Governor or employed or holding office in a state agency,”\(^\text{90}\) which includes attorneys.\(^\text{91}\) Local government employees are also protected by whistleblower provisions.\(^\text{92}\) Depending on which whistleblower statute applies, private counsel retained by the government may not always be protected from termination for speaking out against improper government activity.\(^\text{93}\)

In passing the statutes, the legislature intended to facilitate and encourage whistleblowing in order to promote integrity in government.\(^\text{94}\) However, the language of the statute makes it clear that whistleblowing is optional. Furthermore, employees are not authorized to reveal "information otherwise prohibited by or under law."

B. A California Attorney’s Duty of Confidentiality

The whistleblowing statutes encourage government employees, including attorneys, to act ethically by revealing waste and wrongdoing in the government. Yet, the competing duty to protect client confidentiality is one of the most important ethical duties of a lawyer.

Attorney behavior in California is governed by two bodies of law: California Business and Professions Code sections 6000–6238 ("Code") and the California Rules of Professional Conduct ("Rules"). Members of the state bar could be subject to discipline for a violation of either the Code or the Rules.

The duty of confidentiality is codified in section 6068(e)(1) of the California Business and Professions Code, which mandates that an attorney "maintain inviolate the confidence, and at every peril to himself or herself to preserve the secrets, of his or her client."

Between 1880 and 2003, the only amendment to the language of this provision made the pronouns gender-neutral. In 2003, the legislature passed the sole statutory exception to the duty of

96. Id. § 8547.3(d); see also id. §§ 9149.21, 9149.23(c).
97. The duty of confidentiality is broader in scope than the attorney-client privilege, which an attorney can assert before a court when trying to protect a communication from being considered in evidence. See, e.g., In re Johnson, Cal. State Bar Standing Comm. on Prof’l Responsibility & Conduct, 4 Cal. State Bar Ct. Rptr. 179 (2000); Kevin E. Mohr, California’s Duty of Confidentiality: Is It Time for a Life-Threatening Criminal Act Exception?, 39 SAN DIEGO L. REV. 307, 317 n.28 (2002) (explaining that the attorney-client privilege also applies to discovery).
99. See CALIFORNIA LEGAL ETHICS, supra note 71, at 44.
100. See id. at 44–46.
101. The statute’s use of the words “confidence” and “secrets” has been criticized for failing to adequately define the confidential information it seeks to protect. See, e.g., Proposed Cal. Rule of Prof’l Conduct 3-100 (1998) (on file with the state bar).

DUTY OF CONFIDENTIALITY

confidentiality.104 The exception allows an attorney to reveal confidential information where the attorney "reasonably believes the disclosure is necessary to prevent a criminal act that the attorney reasonably believes is likely to result in death of, or substantial bodily harm to, an individual."105

The Rules merely supplement this statutory duty of confidentiality.106 Rule 3-100 prohibits a state bar member from revealing confidential information under section 6068(e)(1) unless an exception applies or the client gives informed consent.107 Rule 3-100 then reiterates the exception mentioned in section 6068(e)(2) and provides guidance about the steps a bar member should take when revealing information to prevent a criminal act that could result in substantial injury or death.108

The duty of confidentiality is one of the key aspects of the attorney-client fiduciary relationship.109 It is "fundamental" to the existence of our legal system.110 On an individual level, confidentiality ensures that a client is completely free to trust her lawyer with sensitive information, thereby promoting open communication.111 This level of communication allows the attorney to provide sound advice either in a planning or litigation context. Confidentiality also enriches the entire legal system by encouraging potential clients to seek legal advice.112 Such advice is beneficial both to the client and arguably to the larger society.113 For attorneys, the duty of confidentiality is a reminder of the importance of undivided loyalty to one’s client.\textsuperscript{114}

As discussed, however, the existing framework results in tension between the policies of government openness and client confidentiality. Although the binding duty of confidentiality carries more weight than the statutes that protect whistleblowing,\textsuperscript{115} there may be occasions where this dynamic could further empower an official to take advantage of the public trust by committing fraud, knowing full well that his attorney’s lips are sealed.

IV. CRITIQUE OF THE CURRENT SYSTEM

Government attorneys are torn between these competing values of transparency and secrecy. While the whistleblower statutes encourage these attorneys to listen to their conscience, the ethics provisions mandate that they ignore this awareness in favor of client confidentiality. The first problem with this system is that while the legislature and the supreme court have an interest in protecting the duty of confidentiality, the legislature ends up completely controlling the scope of this duty because it is enshrined in statute. This power imbalance stymies debate in the legal community about possible exceptions to this duty. Second, the lack of an express exception to the duty of confidentiality forces the state bar to choose between prosecuting an otherwise innocent attorney or ignoring the ethics provisions, resulting in inconsistent application of ethical rules. Finally, the Rule of Professional Conduct that governs organizational clients fails to take into account the unique position of a government attorney. This lack of guidance makes it difficult for these attorneys to identify their client for purposes of understanding to whom they owe the duty of confidentiality.

\textsuperscript{114} Anderson v. Eaton, 293 P. 788, 790 (Cal. 1930) (stating that confidentiality keeps “the honest practitioner from putting himself in a position where he may be required to choose between conflicting duties ... rather than to enforce to their full extent the rights of the interest which he should alone represent”).

\textsuperscript{115} In fact, the statutory duty of confidentiality overrides the effect of the whistleblower protections; the statutes do not apply to whistleblowing prohibited by law. CAL. GOV’T CODE § 9149.21 (West 2005). Therefore, since the duty of confidentiality is also codified by statute, an attorney who discloses a client’s confidential information would not be immune to retaliation under the whistleblower protection statutes.
A. Legislative Control of the Duty of Confidentiality Prevents the Supreme Court from Participating in the Confidentiality Discussion

Although both the legislature and supreme court theoretically have an interest in preserving the duty of confidentiality, in practice, the legislature alone controls the duty. As such, housing the duty of confidentiality in the Business and Professions Code impedes the supreme court from exercising its inherent power over the duty of confidentiality. In the following examination this issue, this Part will discuss the basis for each branch’s control over confidentiality and explain the dynamics of the power-sharing between the two branches.

1. The Evolution of the California Legislature and Supreme Court’s Shared Power over Attorney Conduct

The legislature and the supreme court both have an interest in promoting good attorney conduct. The supreme court must ensure that the legal system functions properly since this is one of the court’s main duties under the California Constitution. In contrast, the legislature seeks to protect the public at large by preventing attorneys from abusing their positions of power. Therefore, the legislature is also allowed to regulate attorney conduct. It “may put reasonable restrictions upon constitutional functions of the courts provided they do not defeat or materially impair the exercise of those functions.”

The legislature has a long history of regulating attorney conduct. In 1927, the legislature formally adopted the Bar Act (“Act”), which is now a part of the California Business & Professions Code. The Act created an integrated state bar. Prior to the passage of the Act, existing voluntary bar associations experienced difficulty in enforcing professional standards and assimilating the large waves of attorneys arriving in California. Moreover, laypersons posing as lawyers had created a fiercely competitive market for clients.

The Act officially recognized the supreme court’s tradition of assuming jurisdiction over attorney discipline. The Act also established the state bar as a “public corporation” to help the supreme court carry out its disciplinary duties. The state bar is merely an “administrative assistant to or adjunct of [the] court.” The supreme court is the ultimate arbiter of admittance to practice law, suspension, and disbarment.

Once the Act codified the California Supreme Court’s disciplinary power over attorneys, the court in 1928 adopted its own Rules of Professional Conduct. Today’s Rules patch together aspects of the American Bar Association (“ABA”) Model Rules, the old ABA Model Code, and earlier California legal ethics rules. To amend a Rule of Professional Conduct, the California Bar’s Board of Governors adopts a draft amendment and submits it to the supreme court for approval.

In California, like in most states, the supreme court oversees the entire judicial system. “[T]he power to regulate the practice of law, including the power to admit and to discipline attorneys, has long been recognized to be among the inherent powers of the article VI [of the California Constitution] courts.” Despite the fact that this power belongs to the supreme court, the legislature manages attorney conduct through the Act. One of the Act’s functions is regulating behavior “which would constitute the unauthorized practice of law if performed by a layman.” The Act defines the duties of an attorney, among them the duty of confidentiality. Additionally, the Act includes provisions that govern fee agreements and advertising, the violation of which could lead to discipline. Sections like these equate to direct regulation of attorney conduct by the legislature.

While the Act provoked immediate controversy, the California Supreme Court upheld it in State Bar of California v. Superior Court of Los Angeles County. The court noted that attorneys constitute the largest and most influential group of professionals in California. As officers of the courts, attorneys have a duty both to promote the administration of justice and to serve the public at large. Because being a lawyer is a prerequisite to becoming a judge, however, the court implied that it was necessary to have another branch keep watch over the judiciary.

Hence, under the constitutional doctrine of separation of powers, the court has inherent and primary regulatory power [over admission to practice law].” Id. (citations omitted); WITKIN, Attorneys, supra note 98, § 356, at 438.

It is to be noted also that from the body of the legal profession it is required . . . the justices and judges of all courts of record and of certain other subordinate tribunals must be chosen.144

In the court's opinion, fear of attorney omnipotence justified legislative oversight of professional conduct.145 Consistent with this decision, the California Supreme Court has never held that the Act's provisions regulating attorney conduct are an unconstitutional exercise of legislative authority.146

To protect the public, the legislature is authorized under its police power to create laws that govern the practice of law.147 Similarly, the California Supreme Court seeks to protect the public through the Rules of Professional Conduct and its own disciplinary authority.148 The supreme court enacts the Rules to set standards based on the court's perception of what constitutes appropriate legal practice.149 When attorneys fail to comply with these standards, members of the public can vindicate their rights by reporting the misconduct to the state bar.150 Therefore, the supreme court's and the legislature's goals dovetail with respect to attorney discipline. While the legislature must protect the public welfare,151 the court must be vigilant to ensure the reliability of the system it oversees.152

2. The Practical Effect of This Shared Power

Although in theory the legislature and the supreme court both enjoy power over the duty of confidentiality, in practice, the legislature's role overshadows that of the supreme court because the duty has always been enshrined in statute.53 An example of this dynamic is the story of how Rule of Professional Conduct 3-100 came into existence.

Before 1987, there was no mention of the duty of confidentiality in the Rules.54 In 1987, the state bar first proposed that the supreme court adopt Rule 3-100, which would borrow section 6068(e)'s concept of confidentiality and include five express exceptions to the duty.55 The proposed Rule defined the terms "confidence" and "secrets" to clarify potentially ambiguous language in section 6068(e).56

In declining to adopt this new Rule, the court did not provide its reasons.57 In a letter to the president of the state bar, however, the court "suggested that if the rule was intended to permit disclosure in a proceeding where the attorney-client evidentiary privilege attached, the supreme court might not have the authority to approve such a rule."58 As such, it appears that the court feared intruding on the legislature's jurisdiction by creating an exception to the duty of confidentiality without a corresponding evidentiary exception to the attorney-client privilege.59

In 1992, the state bar again submitted a proposed rule to the supreme court that defined the duty of confidentiality but proposed only one exception to it.60 The exception was limited to preventing criminal acts that could result in serious bodily injury.\textsuperscript{161} This version also included a "safe harbor," whereby a lawyer who disclosed client information under the applicable exception would not be subject to discipline by the bar.\textsuperscript{162} The supreme court again rejected this suggestion without explanation.\textsuperscript{163}

In 1998, the state bar proposed a third version of rule 3-100 that again included an exception for criminal acts that might result in substantial bodily harm.\textsuperscript{164} This version abandoned the "safe harbor" provision\textsuperscript{165} but suffered the same fate as its predecessors, receiving another curt denial.\textsuperscript{166}

A few years later, in response to the Ossias affair, the bar tried to provide guidance for future whistleblowers by clarifying the relationship of a government attorney to her client.\textsuperscript{167} In denying the bar's request, the court became slightly more generous by providing a one-sentence reason for rejecting the Rule, citing a conflict with the provisions of section 6068(e) of the Business and Professions Code.\textsuperscript{168}

It was only after the legislature in 2003 passed Code section 6068(e)(2),\textsuperscript{169} the criminal act exception to the duty of confidentiality, that the supreme court was willing to approve a Rule that mentioned the duty of confidentiality.\textsuperscript{170} The current version of Rule 3-100 merely refers to the duty mentioned in section 6068(e)(1) and explains how to implement the exception in section 6068(e)(2).\textsuperscript{171}

With the help of the bar's input and proposals, the court has had ample opportunities to clarify the scope of the duty and adopt appropriate exceptions. However, the court has rebuffed the legal community’s repeated attempts to refine the duty of confidentiality. In the future, the supreme court should at least provide its reasons for declining to adopt Rules, if for no other reason than to inform the state bar of which proposed modifications might be acceptable.

In light of the supreme court’s reference to 6068(e) when rejecting proposed Rule 3-600 and the fact that the court changed the Rules only after the legislature had enacted the statutory exception to the duty of confidentiality, it appears that the supreme court has been hesitant to even consider modifying the duty for fear of stepping on the legislature’s toes.\textsuperscript{172} However, the duty of confidentiality is an important component of the legal system and therefore falls within the supreme court’s jurisdiction. The supreme court’s reluctant approach to adopting rules that deal with confidentiality has allowed the legislature to “defeat or materially impair the exercise of [the supreme court’s] functions.”\textsuperscript{173} Therefore, keeping the duty of confidentiality in the Business and Professions Code would further prevent the supreme court from exercising its due power over the duty of confidentiality.

\textbf{B. If Immunity Is Uncertain, Few Will Dare to Speak Out}

When there is a conflict between an attorney’s mandatory duty of confidentiality and optional whistleblower statutes, the state bar is forced to bring disciplinary action against a government attorney who blows the whistle.\textsuperscript{174} If the bar instead chooses to favor transparency policies by ignoring the plain language of the ethics provisions, its enforcement procedures appear subjective and arbitrary. On one hand, any appearance of inconsistent application of the rules undermines the credibility of the bar. On the other, otherwise innocent attorneys who perform a valuable public service might lose their livelihoods, despite statutory language that encourages them to speak out.

  \item 174. Attorney General, \textit{supra} note 54.
\end{itemize}
The way in which the bar handled the Ossias investigation illustrates the community’s inclination to protect government attorney whistleblowing in spite of clear statutory language to the contrary. After initiating an investigation into Ossias’s disclosures, the California Bar’s Office of Trial Counsel communicated to Ossias’s attorney its decision to discontinue the investigation. The deputy trial counsel declined to analyze whether the Department of Insurance was Ossias’s client or whether she had breached her duty of confidentiality by providing documents to legislative committees. Instead, Ossias was not disciplined because her conduct “(1) . . . was consistent with the spirit of the Whistleblower Protection Act; (2) . . . advanced important public policy considerations bearing on the responsibilities of the office of insurance commissioner; and (3) [was] not otherwise subject to prosecution under the guidelines set forth in this office’s Statement of Disciplinary Priorities.”

The bar’s letter does not adequately explain its decision because there is no discussion of how Ossias’s actions apply to the legal framework governing attorney discipline. Instead of directly attacking the issues, the letter presented flimsy reasons for ending the investigation. Although this approach was beneficial to Ossias, it provides no indication of how the bar will approach future whistleblowers.

The first reason for exonerating Ossias—that she acted in the “spirit” of the Whistleblower Act—was not at issue. Rather, the bar was tasked with deciding whether she had violated her duty under the provisions regulating attorney conduct. The second reason—that her behavior promoted the department’s public policy considerations—essentially means that her “conduct assisted her client, the Department of Insurance, in doing its job." Public policy is not an excuse for violating an attorney’s ethical obligations. The third and final reason—that the behavior was “not otherwise subject to prosecution” was actually an exercise in prosecutorial discretion. In reality, the state bar was attempting to appease the many bar members, public, and legislature who firmly supported Ossias’ actions.

Since Ossias was a likeable whistleblower, her actions were widely publicized, and Quackenbush’s behavior was so egregious, the bar had little choice but to bow to the pressures of public opinion and discontinue the investigation. In failing to discuss whether Ossias had complied with the statutes, the bar perhaps recognized that it was not in a position to fashion its own exception to the duty of confidentiality. The letter is of little use to attorneys faced with a similar situation. Furthermore, the bar explicitly stated that the letter contained no public policy implications.

At the very least, in Ossias’s case, the bar was reluctant to allow the stringent duty of confidentiality to override the whistleblower policies, meaning that the duty of confidentiality may not be as absolute as it seems. Depending on the egregiousness of the act that the whistleblower reveals, the disciplinary arm of the bar might be willing to look the other way. This ad-hoc approach creates uncertainty for government attorneys. They are unable to realistically assess the risks and benefits of disclosure because they do not know whether they will be disciplined or if so, to what extent. If an attorney is not sure whether it is safe to speak out, she will likely choose to be silent. There is a public cost to silence: a watered-down approach to government transparency.

Some might argue that the duty of confidentiality should always be favored over transparency policies, even in the case of government attorneys. A stringent duty of confidentiality is an essential aspect of the legal system. Although this is true, government attorneys are in a unique position. Like their fellow civil servants, they are repositories of public trust and are paid out of tax money to serve the public. To allow civil servants to use a government attorney’s services to commit a fraud on the public does not enrich society. Public officials cannot expect the same level of confidentiality as a private client.

In sum, the combination of ethics provisions and whistleblower statutes does little to support the important public policy of transparency. Where the conditions are right, there may be future cases that warrant breaching the duty of confidentiality. Creating a narrowly tailored standard to guide future government-attorney whistleblowers would not erode all confidentiality. While the provisions of a possible exception to the duty of confidentiality for government attorneys are beyond the scope of this Note, a change in the structure of the duty of confidentiality could make the system more amenable to adopting important policy proposals.

C. "Government as Client" Is Not Equivalent to "Organization As Client"

The tension between the competing obligations of transparency and confidentiality is exacerbated by the fact that the government attorney is representing an organizational client with a non-traditional power structure. Rule of Professional Conduct 3-600 defines the "client" of an attorney that represents an organization. The rule, however, fails to take into account the unique situation of government attorneys. First, and most importantly, it is not clear to whom a public attorney owes a duty of confidentiality. Second, the rule’s procedure for reporting harmful behavior is unhelpful to a government attorney because a public entity has different goals and a more complex organizational structure than a private company. 197

1. The Structure and Content of Rule 3-600

Rule 3-600 defines an organizational client as the entity itself, acting through the highest authorized agent. 198 Where an employee acts in a manner that could injure the organization, the attorney is prohibited from breaching her duty of confidentiality under California Business and Professions Code section 6068(e). 199 In this situation, the attorney has three possible options: (1) to urge reconsideration; 200 (2) to report the issue to a higher internal authority, or if necessary, to the highest person who is authorized to represent the organization; 201 or (3) to discontinue the representation in accordance with the mandatory resignation procedures listed in Rule 3-700. 202

Furthermore, when the officers, directors, shareholders, or employees’ interests conflict with the organization’s interests, the attorney is expected to explain that she is representing the entire organization, not them as individuals. 203 The lawyer “should not be influenced by the personal desires of any person or organization” 204 because the only client is the “corporate entity actually represented.” 205

2. The Rule’s Definition of “Client”

Does Not Apply to Government Entities

The central problem with this rule is that it fails to take into account the unique nature of a government “client.” 206 The rule designates “client” as “the organization itself, acting through the highest authorized officer, employee, body, or constituent overseeing the particular engagement.”

In a non-governmental corporation, this “client” is clearly identifiable because there is often a hierarchy of power and a formal procedure for decision making. In the government context, however, this concept of “highest authorized officer” is ambiguous because there are many potential stakeholders who have “authority” to make decisions for the organization, and it may be difficult to prioritize who is the “highest” in command.

For example, the legislature may allocate funding and regulate the organizational structure while the executive branch appoints an agency director. This multi-layered approach to administrating a governmental organization makes it unclear who has the ultimate responsibility for the organization. Without that information, the attorney cannot know to whom she owes the duty of confidentiality.

3. The Rule’s Contemplated Reporting Scheme Does Not Apply to Government Organizations

Rule 3-600 describes the steps an attorney can take to report wrongdoing to the “highest internal authority that can act on behalf of the organization.” However, this scheme does not make sense in the government context. First, the organizational harm described in the rule does not reflect the concerns of a governmental organization. Second, the lack of a definition of the “client” means that the attorney does not know to whom she is authorized to report this harm.

The type of harm a governmental organization may suffer is different from the rule’s contemplated harms. For this reason, a government attorney might not be able to determine which types of activities merit reporting. The rule recognizes two types of harm: (1) "a violation of law reasonably imputable to the organization;" and (2) behavior "which is likely to result in substantial injury to the organization." 214 Since government organizations are not motivated by profit, the types of "injury" a government organization could suffer are inherently different from those of a regular corporation. While corporations are vulnerable to losing profitability or customer good-will if an employee is corrupt, a government organization will not be shut down because of a few bad eggs. 215 The government entity may risk public distrust; however, its ability to exist will not be threatened in the same way that a corporation would. 216 Because this concept of "harm" to a government organization is so ambiguous, it is also subjective and difficult to identify. Therefore, the current language of Rule 3-600 that authorizes an attorney to report "harmful" activities does not provide sufficient guidance to government attorneys.

Moreover, if a government attorney feels compelled to report wrongdoing, Rule 3-600's reporting scheme would be ineffective. Determining who is the "highest internal authority" 217 to whom the attorney may report is difficult in the government context because "highest" and "internal" are open to interpretation unless they are specifically defined. For example, Cindy Ossias believed that the public was her client, in particular because the mission of the CDI is to protect consumers. 218 Depending on how one chooses to identify the government client, the "highest internal authority" could be the director of the agency, the legislative subcommittee that oversees the agency, the speaker of the assembly, or the governor. 219 Since government attorneys currently have no guidance on the identity of their "client," they do not know to whom they owe a duty of confidentiality and, therefore, must guess as to how they can safely report organizational wrongdoing.

V. PROPOSAL

As illustrated above, the current legal framework makes it difficult for government attorneys to reconcile these competing policies. This Note proposes two solutions to the challenges discussed above. First, the bar should propose that the regulations outlining an attorney’s duty of confidentiality be moved from the California Business and Professions Code to the Rules of Professional Conduct. Second, the bar should identify the client of an attorney representing a governmental organization and incorporate this new definition into a separate rule. While these solutions are independent of each other, both should be adopted. If that is not possible, however, implementing either alternative could significantly improve the current situation. In outlining the benefits of these potential changes, this Part will explain how the proposals address the problems with the current legal framework, consider limitations to the proposals, and explore how to overcome these limitations.

A. Transfer the Duty of Confidentiality to the Rules of Professional Conduct

1. Proposal

The regulations outlining an attorney’s duty of confidentiality should be moved from the California Business and Professions Code to the Rules of Professional Conduct because doing so would strike the appropriate constitutional balance between the supreme court’s concern for the legal system and the legislature’s desire to protect the public. As noted, the supreme court has rebuffed all efforts by the bar to modify the duty of confidentiality, apparently because the court believes it is powerless to do so as long as the duty is codified. This stance by the court does a disservice to the legal system because the bar and the supreme court are in the best position to shape the duty of confidentiality.

First, the supreme court has the inherent power to regulate attorneys. As noted above, the legislature is allowed to share this power subject to certain limits.\textsuperscript{223} In the past, when the supreme court perceived that the legislature was preventing it from exercising this power over the legal system, the court reasserted its right to act unilaterally.\textsuperscript{224} For example, the legislature typically designates how much the bar can collect in dues, although the bar functions as an arm of the supreme court.\textsuperscript{225} In 1997, however, Governor Pete Wilson vetoed a bill which would have enabled the bar to collect yearly dues of $458.00, and the bar’s disciplinary system became severely backlogged due to lack of funding.\textsuperscript{226} Since the disciplinary system is the court’s mechanism for ensuring good attorney conduct, the court held that it was necessary to impose the fees.\textsuperscript{227}

Similarly, the court’s reticence to change the Rules of Professional Conduct for fear of affecting the statutory duty of confidentiality\textsuperscript{228} has allowed the legislature to “defeat or materially impair the exercise of these functions.”\textsuperscript{229} The primary purpose\textsuperscript{230} of the duty of confidentiality is to strengthen the legal system\textsuperscript{231} and the duty is an essential component of the court’s power to regulate attorney conduct.\textsuperscript{232} Therefore, the court should follow its reasoning from \textit{In Re Attorney Discipline System}\textsuperscript{233} by reasserting its power over the duty of confidentiality.

Second, the bar and its respective committees are in the best position to study the dynamics of the duty of confidentiality.

Because the bar\textsuperscript{234} spends the bulk of its time and energy evaluating whether a particular attorney's behavior complies with the disciplinary rules,\textsuperscript{235} it is familiar with the pitfalls of the current ethics provisions and is in a position to suggest potential revisions. Furthermore, the bar has subcommittees staffed with ethics experts who are tasked with researching the Rules of Professional Conduct.\textsuperscript{236} For example, the principal focus of the bar's Commission for the Revision of the Rules is to stay abreast of developments in the field of professional responsibility.\textsuperscript{237} If the duty of confidentiality were exclusively in the Rules, the bar's recommended modifications to the duty would not fall on deaf ears, as they sometimes have in the past. Instead, the bar's suggested changes would have a better chance of being implemented. Further, any changes to the duty of confidentiality would be grounded in a careful study of the current trends in legal ethics.

Third, housing the duty of confidentiality in the Rules of Professional Conduct would provide greater flexibility for modification without eroding the duty because the court is less swayed by political currents and can act independently of other branches.\textsuperscript{238} Since the legislative process requires continuous negotiation between political parties, the legislature is "probably more susceptible than the court to the pressures of various interested parties, and the compromises that likely would ensue might weaken the proposed legislation."\textsuperscript{239} Although such negotiations might be appropriate for other matters, such as fee arrangements and advertising regulations, the duty of confidentiality is essential to the attorney-client relationship.\textsuperscript{240} The supreme court, therefore, is best positioned to oversee the duty because it would be able to independently evaluate the merits of a proposed change.

Although the court does not face the same political pressure as the legislature, there are important checks on its power to regulate attorney conduct. First, unlike federal Supreme Court justices, California Supreme Court justices do not enjoy life tenure; rather, they are re-elected every twelve years. Although twelve years may be a long time for a constituent to remember a justice’s controversial decision, the justices are still subject to some degree of accountability. Moreover, the court and the bar are both “sensitive to the concerns of their constituents” and therefore unlikely to make any drastic changes to the duty of confidentiality. The bar’s policy of soliciting public comment on proposed rules seeks to incorporate the views of the public at large and the many stakeholders within the bar. As a result of this process, the bar has even revised and withdrawn proposed rules. This respect for the legal community’s input, as well as the fact that the justices have to earn their re-election, will keep the court from unduly modifying the duty of confidentiality.

Finally, moving the duty to the Rules of Professional Conduct would not erode California’s strict duty of confidentiality. The court has a strong record of protecting the attorney-client relationship. Moreover, the bar carefully guards its own interests with respect to the duty of confidentiality. For example, the bar opposed Assemblywoman Pavley’s 2006 bill because it feared that the duty of confidentiality was being threatened. The court and bar’s combined commitment to confidentiality is grounded in a desire and responsibility to ensure the integrity of the legal system. Moving the duty of confidentiality to the rules would not decrease its effectiveness because the court understands that it is essential for clients to trust their attorneys with sensitive information.

2. Addressing the Limitations of This Proposal

A limitation of this proposal is the fact that the legislature has presided over the duty of confidentiality for more than 130 years. This proposal would require all three branches of government to agree that this long-held tradition is worth changing. Although the statutory duty is deeply entrenched in California’s legal history, transferring the duty to the Rules of Professional Conduct would strengthen the attorney-client relationship by allowing the legislature and the supreme court to share power over this issue.

First, the legislature would retain some degree of control over attorney confidentiality. The attorney-client privilege, an important subset of the concept of client confidentiality, would remain under the legislature’s control. The supreme court has consistently upheld the legislature’s role in this evidentiary context.

Second, the legislature’s goal in regulating the duty of confidentiality is to protect the public through its police powers. Since the supreme court shares this desire to protect the public, however, transferring the duty to the Rules would not minimize this concern. Rather, making this proposed change would ensure that the supreme court’s interests are also being addressed.

Finally, this idea is neither radical nor novel. The state bars and supreme courts of every state other than California oversee the duty

In joining the rest of the country, California would not be relinquishing or watering down its unique views on confidentiality. Rather, the bar would be able to freely debate the issue without having to worry about persuading the legislature. Moreover, it is possible that the bar would support this transfer. In the wake of the Ossias affair, COPRAC considered transferring the section 6068(e) duty of confidentiality to a new rule but abandoned the idea due to time constraints and other priorities. Now that the court has denied COPRAC’s request to change Rule 3-600 and history has shown the political challenges of modifying the statutory duty, the bar should propose that the duty of confidentiality be transferred to the Rules of Professional Conduct.

B. Create a New Rule of Professional Conduct that Identifies Whom the Government Attorney Is Representing and When to Report Wrongdoing to This “Client”

1. Proposal

This proposal calls on the bar to promulgate a new Rule of Professional Conduct that addresses the attorney-client relationship in the government context. As noted, the language of Rule 3-600 does not apply to the unique situation of government attorneys. Most importantly, the bar should identify the government attorney’s client and delineate an appropriate reporting scheme for informing that “client” of wrongdoing within the organization. Because changes to the language of Rule 3-600 would be comprehensive, the bar should adopt a new rule that specifically addresses attorney-client issues in the government. This proposal should be implemented regardless of whether the duty of confidentiality is transferred to the Rules of Professional Conduct.262

a. Identify whom a government attorney represents

Rule 3-600 identifies the nature of the relationship between an attorney and her client.263 Where a client is an organization, the rule identifies to whom the attorney owes allegiance.264 The bar and supreme court are the only entities that should have the power to define the attorney-client relationship. The court has the constitutional power to regulate attorney conduct.265 The bar has expertise in understanding the issues that affect attorneys and clients in conflict.266 The fact that there is no equivalent statute in the Business and Professions Code reflects the traditional roles of the court and bar as the appropriate entities to define this relationship.

This proposal differs significantly from COPRAC’s unsuccessful attempt to modify Rule 3-600 in 2002.267 First, COPRAC’s proposed rule, although it purported to clarify “who is” the government attorney’s client, did not specifically identify the governmental client because COPRAC recognized that an attorney’s client may vary from case to case.268 In other words, COPRAC noted the complexity of deciding who the client is but declined to answer the question.

Second, COPRAC’s suggestion, in reality, seemed to override the statutory duty of confidentiality or, at least, call it into question by creating a proposed safe-harbor provision.269 The proposed rule contemplated a system for reporting within the agency.\textsuperscript{270} If such a reporting scheme failed and certain conditions were met, a government attorney:

would act consistently with his or her duty of protecting any confidential information as provided in Business and Professions Code section 6068, subdivision (e) by referring the matter to the law enforcement agency charged with responsibility over the matter or to any other governmental agency or official charged with overseeing or regulating the matter . . . \textsuperscript{271}

Accordingly, the proposed rule purported to interpret section 6068(e) as allowing government attorneys to report wrongdoing to oversight agencies. If this rule had defined "client" as a law enforcement or oversight agency, then this reporting scheme would have complied with the requirements of the statutory duty of confidentiality. Without a specific description of the "client," however, the proposed rule potentially allowed an attorney to breach the statutory duty of confidentiality. COPRAC itself recognized that "[a]lthough the Supreme Court can provide a safe harbor from discipline for violation of the rules it has adopted, there is a question whether it can provide a safe harbor for a lawyer who violates a provision of the State Bar Act."\textsuperscript{272} Consequently, the supreme court perceived that the proposed rule unduly intervened with the legislature's jurisdiction and denied the request.\textsuperscript{273}

In contrast, the present proposal is limited to requesting that the bar propose a rule that truly identifies the government "client" and the proper means of reporting wrongdoing \textit{within} the client entity. Instead of taking the drastic step of providing a safe harbor for attorneys to report wrongdoing \textit{outside} of the client entity, which could again be perceived as interfering with the statute, the bar should instead focus on defining the attorney-client relationship to notify attorneys of the boundaries of their representation of the government client.

To determine whom a government attorney represents, the bar will need to evaluate the existing theories and determine which best applies. Designating which model the bar should choose is beyond the scope of this Note. However, numerous scholars have contributed to the debate on the identity of a government client.274 Given that there are so many permutations of the government attorney-client relationship within the structure of the government,275 the bar may have to identify several models of representation and create a catchall category for attorneys in non-traditional roles.

b. Create a separate rule of professional conduct that incorporates this new description of the attorney-government client relationship

The bar should create a new rule specifically addressing the nuances of the attorney-client relationship in the government context.276 Because the current rule fails to consider not only whom a government attorney represents but also how to report wrongdoing to that “client,”277 adopting a new rule would be less confusing than separating each sub-section of Rule 3-600 into “governmental organization” and “non-governmental organization.” Moreover, if the bar decides to designate several models for different government attorneys to identify their client, it might be simpler just to have a separate rule. While this is the preferred method, the bar should at least change the language of Rule 3-600, as discussed above, if it chooses not to adopt a new rule.

275. See Witkowski, supra note 72, at 124–26. Witkowski identifies three examples where the question of “who is the client” arises. Id. First, where an Assistant Attorney General is tasked with litigating an issue for another government agency, yet believes the case should be settled. Id. Second, where several agencies within the same branch of government participate in negotiations and the attorneys are working together despite potentially adverse interests. Id. Third, where a city attorney is assigned to represent the mayor charged with corruption and feels that there is a conflict of interest because she is “obligated to represent the interests of the government and the public.” Id.

276. This new Rule could be entitled “Governmental Organization as Client.”

277. See supra Part IV.C.
2. Addressing the Limitations of This Proposal

Identifying who exactly is the government client will be a challenging task for the bar. However, leaving this inquiry unanswered will keep government attorneys unsure of the nature of their relationship with their “client.” Without clear guidance, an attorney who witnesses wrongdoing will be placed in the uncomfortable position of trying to determine to whom she owes a duty of confidentiality. The bar, with its many resources, should be able to answer this question. Finding the right approach to the issue of the identity of a government client may require several attempts and extensive input from the community; however, this inquiry is an essential task. Currently, a government attorney who does know whom she represents could be exposed to investigation by the bar if she chooses to report wrongdoing. Worse yet, she might decide not to report it at all, to the detriment of the citizens of California.

VI. CONCLUSION

Government attorneys in California are forced to choose between their positions as public servants and counselors of law. Moving the duty of confidentiality to the Rules of Professional Conduct would enable the supreme court to better manage this important duty, ensuring in turn that the changing needs of the legal system are met. The supreme court could then consider the merits of creating an exception to duty for government attorneys. Regardless of whether this occurs, the bar should adopt a new Rule of Professional Conduct and identify who exactly is the client of a government attorney. Adopting one or both of these proposals would provide clarity to attorneys who are currently forced to choose between the legal system’s requirements and their personal ethical concerns.
