THE LOYOLA LAWYER

Alumni Bulletin of the Loyola University School of Law, Los Angeles. Published periodically by the Office of Development.

John Willis, Jr. - Director of Development.
The law as a profession demands today that an attorney continue to learn. A practicing attorney needs to read widely not only to keep up, but also to deepen his perceptions of the law. This is Professor Ogren’s response when asked what he would have to say to the practicing attorney regarding continued legal education.

Professor Ogren says that legal education is breaking away from the patterns of the past, trying out new ideas, and providing a much broader range of expression for the student. He says, “If you have not visited the law school in the past ten to fifteen years, come back and visit. You will be surprised. At Loyola, the faculty still has lots of practical experience and emphasis is practice-oriented. However, in addition, the school is a much more lively and interesting place than it ever has been. There are more student activities, and the students are assuming a more responsible position in the life of Loyola Law School.”

Professor Ogren received his undergraduate degree at the University of Chicago and completed Loyola Law School in 1949. He was a part-time instructor at Loyola from 1954 to 1960, when he associated as a full-time member of the faculty. He has taught Constitutional Law for the last five years, and finds it a most fascinating experience.

Professor Ogren is enthusiastic about the future of Loyola Law School. He is most pleased with the evening school, which offers experienced faculty and maintains the same high standards as the day school. This concept of professional education is meeting a need of the community and the legal profession.

Mrs. Paula Ogren is also in the educational field. She teaches Civics and History at Immaculate Heart. Gardening and browsing in second-hand book stores are Professor Ogren’s hobbies. The Ogrens have six children and make their home in the Wilshire area of Los Angeles.
